PUBLISHED BY CLARENCE HAILEY, NEWMARKET.

PREFACE.

IT is much to be regretted that Photography was not invented at a much earlier period, and that, even after its invention, it was not for many years made any use of for preserving the Portraits of great Horses. There were artists of some celebrity who endeavoured to paint horses in the 18th and earlier part of the 19th Century, but the results were so bad that it is a wonder that they were ever tolerated, even by the most untutored eyes. Herring no doubt made a vast improvement on the work of his predecessors, but after him there came the period during which Harry Hall enjoyed a monoply as a painter of racehorses, and while I have no wish to disparage his work, it is impossible to deny that his art was a retrogression, and a very marked one, from that of Herring.

So accustomed did the public become to Harry Hall's type of horse picture, that when, after his death, artists came along who were bold enough to paint more or less life-like portraits of horses, their efforts were not at first appreciated.

Then, when Mr. Clarence Hailey commenced to photograph horses, the public declared that the animals were represented as far coarser and more clumsy than they really were, the fact being that taste in such matters had been vitiated by a long series of pictures all showing spindle shanks, abnormally small heads, light necks, &c.

Gradually the scales fell from men's eyes, and now we are well aware, thanks in the main to Mr. Clarence Hailey's continuous efforts, that the Art of Photography is as successful in regard to horses as it is in any other direction. No painter in existence can surpass many of Mr. Hailey's happiest efforts, among which the portraits of "Gallinule" and "Bend Or" may be taken as fair samples.

A horse is, and must always be, a more difficult subject for a photographic artist to deal with than a man, inasmuch as there is great difficulty in posing a horse satisfactorily, while a man will sit as he is told. It will be apparent, however, to all who look over Mr. Hailey's work that he has succeeded wonderfully well, and this collection of portraits must be not only invaluable to breeders and owners of the present day, but of permanent interest to future generations, as long as the British thoroughbred continue to flourish in these islands.

Only five of the long list of horses whose portraits appear are dead. These are "Bend Or," "Galopin," "St. Simon," "Persimmon" and "Pietermaritzberg." No fewer than fifteen Derby winners are included, and the tabulated pedigrees, which come at the end of the work, are particularly convenient for reference.

Long though the list of names is, it does not contain a tithe of the great horses which Mr. Hailey has photographed in his time, and I should particularly have liked to see "Trenton" there, for Mr. Hailey was never more perfectly successful than he was with that grand old horse. This, however, is but a detail. The collection of portraits, as a whole, is quite unequalled, and will commend itself at a glance to all who are interested in the British Thoroughbred.
